

Snakes in the house!

When I first saw my house, it had everything I wanted: Space and good location. In my happiness though, I failed to notice that the adjoining house had been vacant for a while as were two other houses down the road.

Shortly after moving in, my family and I began "receiving" many visitors: Cobras, monitor lizards, rats and all sorts of vermin. Many times I had to call the fire department to catch the snakes and until today, I live in fear that a python might make its way inside.

That's why I now realise two things: First, when inspecting a house for sale, always do so during the day; not at night when darkness can hide things.

Second, pay attention to the neighbourhood. Clogged drains with stagnant water, unkempt plots of grass and vacant or abandoned houses in the midst of being sold or rented can become dwelling places for aedes mosquitoes and other parasites that can make the environment unhealthy and dangerous.

It is puzzling why owners have a lackadaisical attitude towards maintaining their properties, especially since well kept premises can appreciate considerably in value compared to neglected ones.

By allowing their houses to deteriorate, they are also dragging down the price of those surrounding them.

Termite horror

Soon after moving into a house I had bought from a previous owner, I removed some existing cabinets only to find termite trails behind them. However, as I was in a hurry to move in, I decided to scrape them off and paint over.

However, the termites promptly made new holes in the walls and new trails too! Wiping them off only caused them to make more that would double in length the next day.

Fed up with the situation, I engaged a termite extermination company and paid it upfront for a package that was supposed to include fortnightly checks for a couple of months, plus a year's warranty.

After the first visit, it fixed the date for another inspection but never showed up. In fact, it took numerous phone calls to get one of their exterminators to come again, and that second occasion only took place after over a month.

During that time, the exterminator refilled the bait boxes with some chemicals but left without conducting any check on any other wooden structures! Now, another month has passed since their last visit and I don't think the company is delivering on what it promised. Since it received my upfront payment, I believe it simply doesn't care anymore.

The lesson I've learnt from this experience is that owners should only approach reputable companies and, when it comes to termite extermination companies, engage those with thermal scanning technology.

The company I engaged was due to its "attractive package", but the fact is, I paid RM1,400 for nothing, because they've only come to my house twice, and even then, I'm not certain it is termite free.

Smelly, stubborn stains

It seeped. It oozed insidiously onto my pristine white walls and all I could do was watch in horror.

The morbid brown stain the colour of rusted blood grew larger by the minute causing a malicious patch that started to smell. It was an arterial gush from a murdered pipe; it was seeping sewer fluid.

That was the beginning of my nightmare. Over the next few weekends, workmen stormed my home, filling the air with the sounds of hammering, teeth-grinding drilling and acrid smells.

They told me the stain originated from the upstairs bathroom, forcing them to shut it down – and requiring me to have to borrow my housemate's whenever my second bathroom was occupied on a long call.

Taking showers or doing business in unfamiliar surroundings is not something that comes naturally for me, especially on the occasions when I have to lug my clothes and toiletries over to shower and change.

Lesson learnt? Before renting the next house, I will definitely check on the condition of the bathroom and the pipes because trust me, repair works are a nuisance.
